Rural Livelihoods and Globalization

Poverty at a global scale remains concentrated in rural areas. While agriculture has historically been the primary rural industry, and remains a very important one to this day, globalization is transforming rural areas in various and sometimes unexpected ways. In this course, we will learn how people in rural areas make a living and how they have had to adapt to globalization. During the first portion of the course, we will critically examine the "sustainable rural livelihoods" framework, a popular lens for understanding rural development. We will then take a closer look, each week, at a different industry transforming livelihoods in rural areas: small-scale farming, plantations, manufacturing, mining, tourism, and conservation. This course will be delivered online and synchronously
